

Subject Line: What does a million-dollar decision feel like?

Hey Michelle!

Something happened a few days back. And it was both intriguing and shocking at the same time.

Let me tell you about it...

On that faithful day, a student of mine came to me and asked “What does a million-dollar decision feel like?” I get asked lots of questions Michelle, but this was different. And it startled me for a while.

So after a few intense minutes of brainstorming. It dawns on me that, we’ve actually got it wrong.

This is why I said so...

Most times we look forward to when we are “Signing the million-dollar cheques”. So much that we ignore the crucial parts of that future, which is “The process”.

Yes, Michelle! I mean all the little, almost insignificant decisions we make on the way to “Living the Dream”. When in fact, these insignificant decisions are the crucial part of “The Process”. Because they are what defines us, and forges the road to the big payday.

Don’t you think so?

Okay! Let's imagine Jeff Bezos was not so confident in himself, that he chicken out on his “Big Idea” to start amazon.

Or

If Bill Gates was so scared of what people would say when he started his software company (Microsoft).

Can you imagine how unfortunate? Not only to themselves but to the millions of lives benefitting from their ideas. Do you now see the mighty roles small decisions play, in defining both our present and future?

The answer to the million-dollar question Michelle...

Before the answer, you must know the reason I go out of my way to support as many as possible.

You see, lots of people possess extraordinary aspirations and ideas... And many do not have the courage, confidence, or knowledge, to birth or sustain these ideas.

P.S.S. This was my answer to the million-dollar question:

"The significant feeling from such a decision will definitely be excitement.

And the sense of satisfaction and fulfillment it comes with... Not for the result of that one decision alone. But for the many little significant decisions that had led to that moment."
